In Orientalism, Edward Said - applies Foucault's method of discourse analysis to 18th- 19th- and 20th-century writings about the Middle East by British and French novelists, travelers, and academics. Said At the heart of the discourse of Orientalism is the conviction that the countries of the Middle East lag behind those of Europe and can only improve under the tutelage of Europeans- Said argues that the discourse of Orientalism laid the foundation for the colonial project and supported it once it was underway. In addition to Said, the historians of the subaltern studies movement have adapted a Foucauldian view of history, in their case to analyze Indian colonial history. Prakash Although at odds in many ways, both discourses drew heavily from progress narratives.
